And within the criminal justice system, if you look at a defence lawyer you might wonder why he or she is helping you to become a convicted criminal. But in one high profile trial of a man charged with the gangland killing of three police officers, the work of one of the lawyers is slowly coming to light. It is revealing the lengths he went to in order to help his client become a criminal, an effort that has been backed by the judge in the case. Prosecutor Peter Rich's crack team has painted a clear picture of the close relationship between the lawyers. Over the three years that they have been in court together, the pair have gone out together for dinner, attended the theatre and even travelled to the ski slopes. Rich and Senior Constable Rick Taylor have attended a charity benefit together for the NSW Police Association, and together they have sponsored a police ball. The relationship goes beyond court. Rich has given his client the key to his house in the beachside holiday town of Byron Bay. And when the lawyer left the courtroom, the police officer walked him to his car. "Can I get your keys?" Taylor asked as the lawyer opened the door. "No," replied the lawyer. "My car keys," Taylor tried again. "No, they're in the house," the lawyer said. But the men were not in the lawyer's house. Instead they drove to the lawyer's office. When they returned to the car, the police officer said: "Your house key, I don't have it on me," to which the lawyer replied: "I left it in the car." Afterwards, the lawyer walked up the steps of the Byron Bay court and waved at the officer as he drove away. His arrival at court in Manly, Sydney, was marked by a cake. When the lawyer arrived, it was surrounded by candles and the words "Happy birthday Peter Rich" had been written on it. "My client is happy to know that you've baked him a cake," Rich's clerk advised him as he walked into court. Rich later sent a thank you note to the baker.

Analysis of the effect of intravitreal ranibizumab (Lucentis) on post-operative retinal detachment. This study analyses the outcomes of consecutive patients with retinal detachment (RD) who underwent pars plana vitrectomy and intravitreal ranibizumab (Lucentis, Novartis, Basel, Switzerland) at a tertiary centre in north-east England. Retinal detachment is the most common complication of retinal vascular occlusive disease (RVO). Intravitreal ranibizumab is the most recent treatment option for neovascularisation secondary to RVO. However, its efficacy is yet to be established. A retrospective review of the case notes of all consecutive patients with RD who were treated with ranibizumab at the Barts and The London Eye Hospital (London, UK) from July 2006 to August 2008 was carried out. Best-corrected visual acuity (BCVA) was recorded pre-operatively, on first post-operative day (POD), and at 6 weeks and 3 months. There were 27 patients with mean age of 64.9 years (range 39-89), of which 79% were male. Mean follow-up was 8.4 months (range 3-16). The mean number of ranibizumab injections before RD repair was 2.1 (range 1-7). The mean pre-operative BCVA was 20/600 (range 20/20 to hand motions). There was a significant improvement in BCVA, from a mean of 20/1200 at baseline to 20/297 (P25, 0x7f, 0x50 2d92ce491b
