Emotion dysregulation (ED), the failure to inhibit or control unwanted emotional responses, is a feature common to both anxiety and depression. While ED has been well-documented in anxiety, it has received less attention in depression. The aim of this study was to examine the ability to control affective content during emotional conflict. College students (N = 26) with varying levels of depression and anxiety were tested using a behavioral task in which they needed to quickly name the colour of angry faces and did so while simultaneously performing a working memory task. As predicted, participants with higher levels of anxiety and depression demonstrated a significant reduction in emotional interference, with depressed participants showing more interference than anxious participants. These findings provide the first evidence of cognitive deficits in depression during emotional conflict and are discussed in light of previous research.
